

Sexting

What If You Found Obscene Pictures on Your Child's Cell Phone?

39% of teens have admitted to sexting and 51% of teen girls feel pressured to send explicit photos, with numbers increasing at an alarming rate. "Not my child" is what parents want to believe, but these statistics show there are many teens participating in this racy trend. Don't let your child become a victim of sexting statistics and don't turn a blind eye thinking this will never happen to your child. Learn to empower them to "Just Say No."

Don't miss your opportunity to interview America's leading "Texpert" and cyberbullying prevention expert, Shawn Marie Edgington, who's on a mission to help parents understand proactive measures that must be taken to minimize their child's exposure to the hazards of sexting.

Learn how parents can protect their children from the growing threat of sexting. Communication is key to prevention, along with the execution of Edgington's Social Media and Cell Phone Contract, one of her resources available online. Shawn Marie Edgington, who is a sexting avoidance expert, explains that this shocking behavior happens more often than most parents realize, and provides advice on how to defend against it.
